The invention of a device that makes this an increasingly likely event takes tremendous effort and time, both in the industry and in the field of science and technology. While certain invention of the physician, makes it still possible to send an even more and faster diagnosis, in our days this cannot be the case because of the laws of physics. The ordinary physical laws that are found in this patent are hardly sufficient to the development of a diagnostic device. According to the patent laws, and on the other hand, without any prior art, when the only thing you have is an old idea, it will be difficult to pass the first examination. Therefore, the allowance of such a patent, even for a medical device, requires a really specific reason and has to be considered in detail. The first examination, a summary examination, is nothing other than a step to give you the right to file a lawsuit. In this case, it does not matter how many good reasons the examiner has. If such a patent is allowed, you have to file a lawsuit, if you do not want to believe the examiner. Biochemical synthesis of a parallel beta-helix and its functional implications: role of a C-terminal leucine residue in the strand-switching reaction. The C-terminal leucine residue of a synthetic complementary DNA (cDNA) has been investigated in its functional capacity on the strand-switching reaction of a 29-mer oligodeoxyribonucleotide. The fluorescence-detected strand-switching reaction was found to be sensitive to the leucine residue. Reactions with a complementary strand which contains a single mutant leucine residue, but no native tryptophan residue, yielded a lower magnitude of fluorescence changes. The fluorescence results as well as the UV melting profiles indicate that the strand-switching efficiency of the oligonucleotide cDNA is affected by the presence of a single native leucine residue at the C-terminus. However, the fluorescence changes were comparatively weaker compared to a complementary oligonucleotide whose complementary strand lacks a native tryptophan residue. In addition, a more marked strand
