Source: Trade and Investment Minister Chrystia Freeland made an unannounced stop in India on Thursday, where she met a Canadian citizen who was facing possible extradition to India. Freeland met Arun Bhagat Thursday at Ottawa's airport and didn't disclose the details of her travel to India to reporters. However, it's believed Freeland met Bhagat, a Canadian citizen whose detention in India has been questioned by the Trudeau government. Freeland is also going to the country next month to attend a major trade event. Bhagat's family is believed to be lobbying the prime minister to do something about his potential deportation. The government has not commented on its handling of the case or why it wants to see Bhagat returned to Canada. In January, Freeland said in a statement. "Canada deeply regrets that Canadian citizen Arun Bhagat Singh has been incarcerated in India since 2012, and that the Indian government has consistently refused to comply with the due process under its own law that would allow him to face charges in court. "As the government of Canada has said, the dispute in this case could have been resolved through diplomatic channels had the Indian government followed these same procedures." Bhagat's case has been the subject of high-profile advocacy by a growing number of Canadian politicians. Paul Heyman, a professor at the Centre for International Governance Innovation in Waterloo, Ont., says it's unusual for a Canadian citizen to be extradited, as opposed to a Canadian detained in another country. "I can't think of any other instance in which a citizen of Canada has been extradited to another country," he said in an interview on Thursday. "It's a serious issue, and I think that there is growing public awareness of it 09e8f5149f
