Assume a function: `def foo(arg1, arg2 = None): # do something with arg1 and arg2` Is there a way to pass `arg1` and `arg2` to `foo` without having to define them on the function's argument list?

Instead of: `foo(arg1, arg2 = None)` How can I pass in `arg1` and `arg2` as a tuple?

`foo((arg1, arg2 = None))` Is there some reason I should not do this, or is it a sign that I have a design flaw? A:

Is there a way to pass `arg1` and `arg2` to `foo` without having to define them on the function's argument list? It's not possible, because it will be impossible for someone to guess what `arg1` and `arg2` should be. You could define them in the function, but then you could just as well write them in the function signature instead. Instead of `d0c515b9f4`
